JOB MARKET PAPER

Strategic Environment: Conservation Policies Effectiveness and Strategic Behavior

Abstract: This paper evaluates the environmental impacts of a USAID-funded conservation project in Eastern Zambia that established protected areas within contracted chiefdom boundaries. Using satellite and administrative data merged at the $1\text{km} \times 1\text{km}$ grid level from 2001 to 2023, I apply a Difference-in-Differences strategy to estimate deforestation impacts across Contracted and Non-Contracted Chiefdoms, as well as within Protected and Non-Protected Areas. I find that the program significantly reduced tree cover loss within Protected Areas but had no overall effect at the chiefdom level. No evidence of leakage is observed in Non-Protected Areas, while positive spillovers occur in nearby Non-Contracted Chiefdoms. Effects are more pronounced in areas with greater infrastructure access and population presence. I also document spatial selection, as protected areas were more likely to be located in remote regions with lower baseline deforestation. The results underscore the importance of addressing spatial targeting and incentive structures in conservation policy design.
